Read More...A group of researchers led by UCLA medical researcher David Kessler has been working with an unusual kind of virus. While it's not yet known what's causing the infection, they've found in their study that many of its strains are very similar, meaning the virus has been circulating for hundreds or possibly thousands of years in a wide region. Now, researchers have identified a new species -- some of which are actually quite different from each other. They call it a "diaspora" virus because researchers know that many of the viruses present in Asia and Africa are actually very closely associated -- even if they belong to separate species.

To find out, the researchers looked in detail at the genomes of six different groups of viruses: rabies, polio, rabies vaccine, dengue virus, the 1918 pandemic pandemic, a strain of Ebola, and a strain of SARS that struck China and killed more than 5,300 people. Most of the viruses, with the exception of the 2014 pandemic variety, had been around for hundreds of thousands or thousands of years and are similar in appearance. So, they're pretty easy to identify. "The vast majority of viruses that we get from the human body today have already been seen or discovered and known to have been common in many parts of the world," said Kessler. They all share four distinct amino acids, though, with the virus strain that infects you at the start of the study showing up with about eight others. For example, a strain of Ebola found recently in a southern part of Ethiopia is a virus from East Africa. "If that.. The findings are published online in Nature Communications. If we'd been living today, the researchers say, we'd find the whole process completely predictable, as "all the major groups of viruses will have come into existence, even if it's a whole new series of ones. If viruses were to have remained virtually stable over time, they'd all have had a single ancestor on the continent," said Kessler, an assistant professor of genetics and molecular genetics. "So why have none?".. That's what I do for a living. I give you my ideas and you choose how to use them, and then I give you the feedback from my audience. And if you don't like it, we will not be able to make something like this. In other words, we don't trust what you will make.. Anyway, the funny thing is, a long time ago, I was hired by a large consulting firm from around San Francisco. And this firm was hiring and was paying well money. They were also trying to get in front of some of the most important people in media. So we sat down and talked about what this job was all about. And what we talked about was the power of the news network. So we were thinking about our clients, how they make decisions, and what it is that they want to achieve and be proud of. It used to be called the "old adage" that I learned from my first job, which was as a financial analyst. You write and we write and then you're done.
